What Inspectors Actually Ask For When They Arrive

About This Webinar

Most employers believe they’re inspection-ready until someone asks for proof. Not a general statement that training is done. Not a policy that says hazards will be controlled. Not a committee meeting that happened months ago. Inspectors usually ask for specific evidence: records, dates, corrective actions, sign-offs, completed inspections, worker instructions, supervisor follow-up, and documentation showing that known risks were addressed.

September is a natural reset point. Regulators return to full pace, operations normalize after summer, and unresolved safety gaps become easier to see. It’s also the right time to test whether the organization can respond quickly when an inspector asks basic but important questions. Who was trained? What hazards were identified? What corrective actions remain open? What did supervisors verify? What has the JHSC raised, and what happened next?

This OHS Insider webinar will help safety professionals prepare for inspections by focusing on practical proof. We’ll review the documents and records that matter most, how to organize them, what inspectors are likely to ask for, and how to identify weak spots before the regulator does. The goal is to move from confidence by assumption to confidence by evidence.
